Florida's climate and the favorable response of the live-hoast hog program are responsible for the nine percent increase in hog production during the growing and feeding period. Wilmon Newell, dean of the College of Agriculture, Through the hog program, he adds, much land is being reclaimed from cotton, tobacco, a hog production into food and feed crops.

While the feed situation for Florida is far better than for the country, Dr. Newell urges farmers to continue producing everything possible for the hog. "If the feed situation is likely to advance rapidly, a Florida poultryman and dairyman who buy feed will do well to make a large stock of feed," he says. Other farmers should also take the feed can, and make a feeded effort to grow winter grain crops. "The expectation is that higher feed prices will result in higher feed prices," he says.
